WEATHER KEY POINTS

03/28/22 - 04/03/22

Monday - Tuesday

- A storm system will bring widespread rain and mountain snow through Monday night, with lingering showers possible on Tuesday
  - Thunderstorms are possible across central and southern California, which could produce hail and heavy rainfall
    - Minor flooding and localized rockslides could develop under the heaviest rainfall, with the biggest threat of flooding in poorly drained locations
    - Primarily beneficial rain is the most likely scenario in most locations, but if the heaviest rainfall passes directly over recent burn scars, flooding and debris flows are possible
      - This threat includes the Colorado and Dolan burn scars in Monterey County through Monday morning, as well as across southern California burn scars through Monday night
  - The heaviest snowfall is expected to remain above 6000 feet, but snow levels may drop down to 4500 ft on Monday in heavier showers
    - Mountain travel will be impacted by accumulating snowfall, primarily along higher mountain passes and roadways
  - Gusty winds are expected across central and southern California on Monday, with minor damage and impacts to transportation possible

Wednesday - Sunday

- Other than a few very light showers possible at times, primarily in the mountains, drier conditions will generally return by mid-week and persist through the end of the week
- Gusty northerly winds on Thursday could lead to some fire weather concerns, especially in portions of Inland Region
- A warming trend could lead to minor heat impacts over the weekend
